

Angelika Kratzer

UMass Amherst

Natural languages have constructions that connect propositions to things in the world that make them true, their truthmakers that is. There is thus factual evidence for how to construe that connection for the purposes of natural language semantics. I will review some of that evidence and argue for a truthmaker semantics where truthmakers are derivable from propositions in a situation semantics.